3628	VA0001954182	462482748	Notorious Brazilian Prison Strives For Reform	SAO LUIS, BRAZIL - JANUARY 27: Female inmates gather with babies as they greet visitors in the Pedrinhas Prison Complex, the largest penitentiary in Maranhao state, on January 27, 2015 in Sao Luis, Brazil. Previously one of the most violent prisons in Brazil, Pedrinhas has seen efforts from a new state administration, new prison officials and judiciary leaders from Maranhao which appear to have quelled some of the unrest within the complex. In 2013, nearly 60 inmates were killed within the complex, including three who were beheaded during rioting. Much of the violence stemmed from broken cells allowing inmates and gang rivals to mix in the patios and open spaces of the complex. Officials recently repaired and repopulated the cells allowing law enforcement access and decreasing violence among prisoners, according to officials. Other reforms include a policy of custody hearings and real-time camera feeds. According to officials there have been no prisoner on prisoner killings inside the complex in nearly four months. Critics believe overcrowding is one of the primary causes of rioting and violence in Brazil's prisons. Additionally, overcrowding has strengthened prison gangs which now span the country and control certain peripheries of cities including Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo and Sao Luis. Brazil now has the fourth-largest prison population in the world behind the U.S., Russia and China. The population of those imprisoned had quadrupled in the past twenty years to around 550,000 and the country needs at least 200,000 new incarceration spaces to eliminate overcrowding. A vast increase in minor drug arrests, a dearth of legal advice for prisoners and a lack of political will for new prisons have contributed to the increases. (Photo by Mario Tama/Getty Images)

According to community organizer John Saah Mbayoh, Saah's mother died of suspected but untested Ebola in West Point before he was brought to the isolation center the evening of August 13. He came with his brother, Tamba, 6, aunt Ma Hawa, and cousins. His brother died on August 15 at the center. Saah fled the center the August 15 with several other patients before it was overrun on August 16 by a mob. Once out in the neighborhood, he was not sheltered, as he had suspected Ebola - so he has been sleeping outside. Residents reportedly began giving him medication, a drip and oral rehydration liquids today. The whereabouts and condition of his aunt and cousins, who left the facility when it was overrun by the crowd, is still unknown at this time. She said she comes to Mexico twice a year to search for her son Manuel Hernandez Valenzuela, who disappeared while crossing through Mexico to re-enter the United States in 2003. He had earlier been deported back to Honduras after working in New Orleans for three years. Thousands of migrants have died, often without a trace, on their journey to the United States, due to violence and thirst. Many have perished riding atop "La Bestia" or The Beast freight train while traveling north. The shelter, called La 72, is run by Franciscan friars and is the first stop for thousands of Central American immigrants crossing through Mexico to reach the United States. 4589	VA0001958589	480029173	Soldiers Sort Through Equipment To Be Disposed Of As Afghanistan Drawdown Continues	GARDEZ, AFGHANISTAN - MARCH 22: SSG Jason Sherman from Peru, Nebraska sorts through excess equipment and supplies left by departing units as the U.S. draws down manpower in the 13-year-old war on March 22, 2014 near Gardez, Afghanistan. Although some of the material will be put back into the Army supply chain most of it will be destroyed or sold for scrap. In the past year the U.S. Military has been reducing troops and equipment in Afghanistan as it transitions from a role of combatants, fighting alongside Afghan soldiers, to assisting the Afghan National Security Forces in an advisory role. President Obama recently ordered the Pentagon to develop a contingency plan for a complete pullout from Afghanistan by the end of 2014 if Afghanistan President Hamid Karzai or his successor refuses to sign the Bilateral Security Agreement. In a 5-4 decision the Supreme Court ruled that it is a crime for one person to buy a gun for another while lying to the dealer about who the gun is for. The law had been challenged by retired police officer Bruce Abramski who was charged with making a "straw purchase" after buying a gun for his uncle, a lawful gun owner, in order to get a police discount at the dealer. When asked on the paperwork if the gun was for him he checked yes. (Photo by Scott Olson/Getty Images)

A coalition of anti police violence and anti racist organizations gathered in Union Square to listen to speakers before setting off on a march down lower Broadway. Following the death of Eric Garner during a confrontation with NYPD officers last summer, New York has become one of the nations focal points for protests against the police. Along with Garner's death, the cases of Ferguson teen Michael Brown and Walter Scott in South Carolina have energized the movement against the police. The marchers hope to highlight the individual cases and to pressure law makers and police departments across the country to institute changes in how the police confront to citizens. The aging prison has an official capacity of about 250 but now holds around 700 prisoners. Brazil's Amazonas state prison system now holds nearly three times as many inmates as it was designed for. A new Justice Ministry report states that Brazil holds 607,000 people in its prisons which only have the capacity for 376,000 inmates. The report notes that Brazil's prison population is now the fourth largest in the world, behind the U.S., Russia and China with the number of Brazilians behind bars nearly doubling in a decade. It is the only country of the four whose prison population continues to rise. Justice Minister Eduardo Cardozo has called the situation 'medieval'. A vast increase in minor drug arrests, a dearth of legal advice for prisoners and a lack of political will for new prisons have contributed to the increased prison population. The report comes amidst a controversial new bill that would reduce the age of adult criminal responsibility in the country from 18 to 16 and place further strain on the country's overwhelmed prison system. The Institute for Regional Conservation released a 10-year report authored by George D. Gann, chief conservation strategist for the group, that included information on 59 rare and endangered plants, many of which used to flourish in South Florida and now are barely clinging to existence in the Everglades and nearby protected areas. The report provides park managers recommendations on habitat management in the face of potential impacts of sea level rise, invasive exotic species and other threats to the health of the ecosystem.
